Join the insurrection! Keep up with the latest news, events, and promotions. The original Spiffy wasn't always quite so Spiffy. In fact, there was a time when the magazine was a small, proud, and loyal publication with big plans. Here are some of the things that used to be, and some of the things that should be. Now, with a bigger band and more readers, Spiffy is spreading its wings. And, with this new improved Spiffy, we can fly higher than ever before. Because our readers are the reason why we can stay in print for over 50 years, with your help, we can publish more articles, more often. If everyone who reads Spiffy, enjoys what they are reading, tells a friend, that will be more articles, more often. So, let's have a great year in business together. Tell all your friends, and then share this message with everyone in your life. It's time for Spiffy to fly. Combat Â .Q: Version control management within Eclipse from the perspective of git I am currently using Git via the Eclipse IDE in order to manage a working project.

Within Eclipse I have created a git repository and set it up correctly. I am now at a stage in my development where I want to do a revision and have done this by using the command `git checkout -f` And that has updated my local working copy with the revision from the git project. Now when I return to my Eclipse session and start to make changes, will these edits not get pushed to the project within Eclipse?

Do I still need to use the command `git commit` In order to commit those edits to the local git repository before committing them to the project? Thank you A: Do you want to know something about Git or about Eclipse? Git is also a SCM, it is an underlying tool. Basically Git is not connected to Eclipse. So Eclipse, it is a tool for you, not to Git. So when I return to my

Eclipse session and start to make changes, will these edits not get pushed to the project within Eclipse? Yes, in fact, Eclipse is an IDE (Integrated Development Environment), its job is to manage project's files(although other tools might be better for that). So, if you have activated the version control of an Eclipse project you will be able to check your latest version from the Eclipse GUI. Also, eclipse's "Source Control" > "Push to Upstream" is enabled by default. When you commit (or push) changes to your repository you're going to select in which project you want to commit those changes and if there are
